

FIGHT FATAL DUEL WITH KEEN MEAT KNIVES

Zoccolo, Butcher, Dying
After Battle with Drink-
Crazed Helper.

Armed with butcher knives, giant and pigmy fought a duel which will end in death early to-day in the gloomy little meat shop under the eaves of No. 123 Mulberry street. Both were butchers, and when the pigmy stabbed the giant over the heart the latter fell on the smaller man and by the sheer weight of his dying body kept him prisoner until the police came in answer to the screams of the women folk.

The dying man, Teodoro Zoccolo, He is at the Hudson Street Hospital. His assailant is Angelo Sama, who, less the surgeons are mistaken, will speedily have to answer to a charge of murder.

For twelve years Zoccolo has kept the little meat shop. With his wife and two children, he lived in one of the narrow hall-like flats above. He was a Calabrian, a great hulking man, able to lift with ease the carcasses that swung from the hooks of the ice chest. All this time he had a helper, one Sama, who was the antithesis of his employer. He was also a Calabrian, a shrunken, parched rat of a man, ugly as a trapped cat and twice as treacherous. He worked for little or nothing, though.

Once when he flared out at Zoccolo too dangerously, he was told to go. He came back within a week, begging for work again. He was over forty and he had grown into the rut too long to change. He said he wanted no pay, but he always had pocket change from Zoccolo.

For several days Sama has been drinking, and his mood has been dangerous. Early to-day Zoccolo had dressed to go to the market for his quarts. As he opened the door he met a shuffling, unsteady figure in the hall. It was Sama.

"I want money," he said, and seized Zoccolo's arm. The two went down to the shop. Here Sama renewed his demands, but Zoccolo refused to give him another cent. Sama reached back and his lean fingers closed on the long slender knife used in the butchering trade. He has been reduced to the proportions of a skeleton. When Zoccolo caught the glint of the freshly sharpened steel as he reached for a blade.

Sama was upon him in a flash. They clinched, each clutching the other's knife hand. Sama twisted his thin wrist around till the slender steel bit and gouged at the big hand that held it and Zoccolo was forced to loosen his hold. Then Sama stabbed swiftly twice. The knife plunged once into Zoccolo's back, once it slit his chest and the third entered the body just over the heart. The giant staggered, then clutched the little man and the two staggered to the edge of the steps that lead to the street and crashed to the pavement, the smaller one beneath and the larger one spouting blood like a geyser from his mouth.

The little man, pinned down and helpless, began to scream. Windows opened and women joined their shrieks at the sight. Men came running and in the fall of the policeman Larkin, of the Elizabeth street station, and Special Officer Schulman.

They dragged the unconscious man off the little butcher. Larkin jumped for a telephone and sent for an ambulance.

Policeman Felgery, also of the Elizabeth street station, hurried up, seized Sama and dragged him off to the station, scratching, before the dying victim.

"Did this man stab you?" asked Felgery. The big man opened his eyes wearily. Then he nodded weakly and became unconscious.

The ambulance came. Dr. Merrill took from the wound over the heart a slender slip of steel. It was the end of a knife that had been broken in that last twisting stroke.

"No hope," said the surgeon, as they lifted the man into the ambulance.

Zoccolo recovered consciousness in the hospital, but it was evident he could not live through the day, so, as is customary among hospitals that desire to keep down their death rate, an order was given to remove him to Bellevue.

The order was given by the superintendent, H. A. Knoll. Coroner Hattburg learned of this and at once took steps to stop it. The Coroner has been making a crusade against the criminal removal of dying people to Bellevue. Knoll explained that he had no room for the man. The Coroner found a dozen vacant cots in the ward. Knoll could not explain. The Coroner warned him that if he removed the man and death should be hastened by such action he would prosecute him for homicide. Zoccolo was not moved.

Sama was later arraigned in the Centre Street Court and held without bail to await the result of Zoccolo's injuries.

DOG ROBBED HER OF HER RAIMENT

Woman Who Went to Rescue of Children Only Sufferer in Encounter.

A dog undertook last night to break up a group of boys who were playing in a lot near No. 1315 Brook avenue. The boys said they tried to "shoo" the dog away, but that it came right at them.

Raymond Williamson, eleven years old, was bitten in the leg. Mrs. Mary Blaser, of No. 86 Washington avenue, thought she would help the lady, but when the dog robbed her of her petticoat and was in a fair way to get more garments she fled crying for a policeman. Policeman Williamson came and started after the dog with his night-stick.

After he had shunted the boys to safety and the dog to a corner Williamson used his revolver. He shot all of which the policeman reported had landed in the dog—were fired. Then the dog died.

The Williamson boy was taken to Lebanon Hospital. The surgeons cauterized the wound, but said it didn't amount to enough to frighten anybody.
